Serum adiponectin concentration has been shown to be low in obesity, type 2 diabetes, and heart failure, and is a negative acute-phase reactant. However, its role in sepsis is not yet defined. The purpose of this study was to investigate the circulating adiponectin level in patients with severe sepsis, and to identify the factors associated with its alteration. The serum adiponectin level of 31 patients with severe sepsis was measured and compared with that of 31 age- and sex-matched healthy subjects. The correlations of serum adiponectin concentration with various parameters were analyzed. The mean serum adiponectin concentration was significantly lower in patients with severe sepsis than in healthy subjects (5.2 ± 2.2 vs. 8.7 ± 4.6 μg/ml, p
